Dear Mr. Wheeler,

There is a major problem with the graphic and language in today's prime time television. The problem is that there's too much foul language and inappropriate graphics on national television. When you let this type of stuff on prime time T.V., anyone can hear that. The main audience that it is affecting is the youth.

This problem is causing problems, and those problems will cause even more problems in the future. These problems are causing the modern youth to use the same foul language they hear on television and it causes a bad influence on their lives. It also causes children to be emotionally unstable. They're not able to feel what's truly wrong or right because of influences they are getting from T.V. Sadly, foul language is becoming part of people's everyday conversations.

However, there is a way where we could find a solution to this problem. Some ideas I've thought of are to try and put a warning sign before televising all programs that may have foul language or graphic things in them. Because programming is available 24-7, mature programming should only be scheduled later at night. We should try use an ethical responsibility with your ability to televise these programs. For example, you could lift up the standards by using children's role models and show them doing good deeds for the community.

I hope you can write back to me soon as this is a project for my Language Arts class and, I'd love to read your response to everybody.

Sincerely,

Tyler Smith
